WORKS-IN-PROGRESS

MONOGRAPH

Accidental Shakespeare

Accidental Shakespeare argues that the Shakespearean text has always been contingent on “accidents” in the printing process. It investigates how the New Bibliographic orthodoxy of distinguishing “substantive” features of early printed plays (words) from “accidental” features (punctuation, spelling, and anything else affecting the “formal presentation” of the text) has obscured stories about failed editorial audacity (e.g., Edward Capell’s eighteenth-century editorial experiments; A.H. Bullen’s vision for the Shakespeare Head Press at the turn of the twentieth century; and Alice Walker’s inheritance of the old-spelling Oxford Shakespeare that never materialized) that shaped “Shakespeare.”

ESSAYS AND ARTICLES

“Typography & the History of Shakespearean Authorship,” for The Oxford Handbook of Shakespeare and Authorship, eds., Will Sharpe and Rory Loughnane (Oxford University Press) (chapter, under contract)

“Women’s Book Ownership and the Problem of Provenance,” for Early Modern Women’s Marginalia, eds., Katherine Acheson and Rosalind Smith (chapter, collection proposal under review)

“Accidents, Intentions, and the Shakespearean Text, 1593-1951” (article, in progress)

“Fleming’s Playbooks: Collecting, Reading, Commenting c. 1695” [with Aaron T. Pratt, Harry Ransom Center] (article, in progress)
